There are few groups on Earth that are as intimidating as female conjoined twins, as they combine both the feelings of being one as well as two. These women must walk among us, they must share. They must learn to adjust to one another's body parts—and despite the fact that most of them have just one heart—they have two brains, two livers, two sets of kidneys, one external and one internal gall bladder, and a great many other things in common. How do they get along? How do they relate to one another, with all their differences? BBC News Online spoke to five women who have been through this physical complication of anatomy as well as the emotional difficulties that come with it. Jilly, age 28 Two years ago, when Jilly was just ten, her mother Kim was 40-something. The couple, both originally from Scotland, were visiting Tokyo, looking for a cheap hotel. They came upon a place that Kim knew. It was her sister's childhood home, and she wanted Kim to see it. Jilly was surprised, though, when her mother left. She wanted to do something special for her sister, she said. So she took her by the hand and they went inside. Kim saw all the family photos that filled the house. They decided to get some lunch at a nearby restaurant. And then they went for

Transcription profiles of distantly related populations of thelytokous Tapinella capra. Tapinella is a plethodontid salamander that undergoes obligatory parthenogenesis producing many generations per year. The maternal transcriptome of Tapinella is well understood, but a new generation of transcriptome data is needed. Here we sequenced the transcriptomes of the newly emerged parthenogenetic females of three geographically separated populations. At the transcriptome level, a comparison of interpopulation differences is provided for the first time. Our data showed that the reproductive mode is associated with transcriptome differences between populations. These results are first evidence that different populations of thelytokous parthenogenetic organisms are associated with transcriptome differences. SURSHNYO, Russia — Tucked into the depths of a small museum in this Siberian village that once was known for its women's luck, an exquisitely painted wooden urn is the subject of much online debate. The artists who crafted the intricate objects, seven of which are on display here, appear not to have been aware of the legendary lore surrounding the object: a woman's fertility. "They were just carrying their artistry to the highest level," said Viktor Zemlyanski, the museum's director, as he stood in the middle of a wall adorned with dozens of the tiny urns. "They're really not concerned with what they're making." Nor does it seem that they were concerned with what they are creating. Aside from a smattering of names and a couple of dates, their little works of art are entirely devoid of information, leaving the mystery surrounding their identity uncloaked. The urns' creators were actually women from the remote village of Surshnyy, which lies some 250 kilometers north of here in the province
