Fatty acid synthase induces apoptosis and S phase-arrest of the cell cycle in human nasopharyngeal carcinoma cells. The control of cell cycle is regulated by complex interacting networks. It is well established that fatty acid synthase (FASN) plays an essential role in energy metabolism and cellular growth by catalyzing the synthesis of a major pool of saturated fatty acids. However, there is insufficient evidence regarding FASN's role in the tumorigenesis of human cancers. Our finding that overexpression of FASN led to induction of apoptosis in caspase-3-dependent manner and S phase-arrest in CNE2 and CNE1 cells suggested that FASN might play some roles in the development and progression of nasopharyngeal carcinoma (NPC). The results from flow cytometry showed that FASN could block the progression of cells into G0/G1 phase, and induce apoptosis. Cell cycle analysis demonstrated that FASN-mediated cell cycle arrest was at G0/G1 phase rather than S phase. Furthermore, the treatment of CNE2-shFASN cells with palmitate (palmitic acid) and myristate (myristic acid) failed to induce S phase arrest. Nevertheless, FASN was found to be phosphorylated by activating nuclear factor-kappa B and the transcription of FASN was regulated by G9a, which resulted in suppression of its gene expression. Our data indicated that FASN over-expression may aid to acellular proliferation in NPC.

Dysregulation of FASN gene expression may be one of the mechanisms underlying NPC carcinogenesis.

Choroidal thickness in normal tension glaucoma, primary open-angle glaucoma, and glaucoma suspects. To determine the mean choroidal thicknesses in patients with normal tension glaucoma (NTG), primary open-angle glaucoma (POAG), and glaucoma suspects. Ninety-two NTG patients (mean age +/- SD, 52.4 +/- 14.9 years), 56 POAG patients (50.9 +/- 11.6 years), and 98 glaucoma suspects (49.0 +/- 14.4 years) were included. Choroidal thicknesses were measured using enhanced-depth imaging optical coherence tomography. The shortest choroidal thickness was measured along the horizontal line passing through the optic disc and the fovea. The choroidal thickness was measured at the superior, inferior, temporal, and nasal quadrants of the macula. The mean choroidal thickness was 240 +/- 64, 236 +/- 64, and 238 +/- 67 microm in the NTG, POAG, and suspects groups, respectively. There was no statistically significant difference in the mean choroidal thickness in the POAG group and the glaucoma suspects group. In the POAG group, a statistically significant thinner choroidal thickness was detected in the nasal quadrant compared to the superior and temporal quadrants (P
