To develop a comparative description of the fetal and neonatal chest, based on macroscopic anatomy. Anatomic study using human fetuses from spontaneous abortions and stillborns. 81 thoracic cavities from 42 fetuses and stillborns were studied. 38 thoracic cavities from 32 fetuses and liveborns were studied, which corresponded to the clinical diagnosis. The study of the intra-thoracic cavities based on macroscopic anatomy allowed a description of the following structures: aorta, arterial system (with branches), bronchi, lung, lymph nodes, pleura, thymus, esophagus, trachea and heart. This study allows an anatomical description of the fetal chest which is frequently used in the clinical practice. This comparative description of the fetal and neonatal chest offers the researcher a richer understanding of thoracic aspects in human growth.Q: Should this trivial question be closed? Should this question be closed? EDIT: I changed the body of the question to fit the reason for closing, as well as added a link to the tour page explaining the rules for closing. A: As a matter of principle, yes. My problem with it is that you've got two relatively related questions, and one of them is easily searchable by anybody interested in the topic. Personally, I would ask the person who submitted the code if they could not make this more obvious, but then I'm a bit of a pedant and ask a lot of questions. :) Related Links Berlin - American and European security officials have seen evidence suggesting Moscow's agents were behind a cyberattack on the German Bundestag's website in October that exposed data on U.S. lawmakers, their staff and the German interior ministry, German newspaper Sueddeutsche Zeitung
