I know that if a container is stopped, it will remove the run time containers. But if a container is stopped, does it also remove the run time container? The reason why I want to understand this is because I have the following scenario: I have a Django application running in a container, and this application is constantly running to this day. Now I do docker stop CONTAINER_NAME. And as the container is removed, it will also remove the run time containers related to the container. But is it because the container is removed, the application no longer exists? Or is it because the application is removed, it also removed the run time containers? What if some other container is started after the container that was stopped? In that scenario, does the container still exist in the current image that was used to stop it? A: docker stop will stop the daemon, it will not delete any containers K
