Ubuntu 13.04 will have the final snapshot before the Developer Release. The RC is out there already and everybody is downloading it, testing it, reporting bugs and generally enjoying it. Somebody from Canonical will release the final version in the next hours or days (we probably don't know exactly when because we are not Canonical). This is a great release and I'm sure that many of you will like Ubuntu 13.04 Saucy Salamander. Some bugs need to be fixed in final release so fix or ignore if you prefer. Although Ubuntu 13.04 is ready for the final release, Canonical have not yet given the date for its release. Brian Murray, Canonical's community manager hinted that Ubuntu 13.04 release will be out on 23rd or less. Since Google just calculates the Jaunty/10.10 release date as 30th October 2009, I take this cue as an indication to be close. I expect seeing the stable release of Ubuntu 13.04 may take away the pressure for the final release. We may also hear more information about the release and its future. Ubuntu has taken over the space occupied by KDE 3.5 as top window manager for Ubuntu. Launcher, Window manager, Metacity, Compiz, and GTK to name a few, are some features in Ubuntu 13.04 Saucy. The desktop environment is applied to the kernel and running programs. The graphical toolkit for the user interface of running programs is GTK. Ubuntu 13.04 Saucy gives us the best alternative to Windows 7. Windows 7 is well known for its ease

Q: How to access element in list of list that is called in another function? I am trying to break down a problem I'm having into smaller pieces and I'm stuck on the following: I have a list of lists as follows: a = [[1, 2, 3, 4], [5, 6, 7, 8], [9, 10, 11, 12], [13, 14, 15, 16]] I want to write a function to sum the numbers in a list in a particular order. The order should be first in the first sub-list, then in the second, third and so on. sum = [] for i in xrange(1, len(a)+1): sum.append(sum(a[i])) print sum This works fine. But now I have another function that returns a list as follows: def get_labels(label): summ = [] label = list(label) for n in range(1, len(label)+1): summ.append(label[n]) return summ When I try to access the elements in the list and sum them up using the above function, it fails. sum2 = [] for i in xrange(0, len(a)+1): sum2.append(sum(get_labels(a[i]))) print sum2 I get the following error: list indices must be integers or slices, not list What do I have to do to fix this? A: Yes, this works. The problem with your code is that here summ.append(label[n]) you are getting the list values. To get the items of the list use sum.append(label[n]) or summ.append(label[n][0]) or summ.append(list(label[n])) A more Pythonic approach: summ = [sum(l) for l in a] This will take care of all the internal list slicing for you, and creates a list with summing the lists. Q: Add a checkbox to a ListView or GridView
