[Specific features of fibrinogenesis in pulmonary tuberculosis]. It has been stated that the formation of haemorrhages in pulmonary tuberculosis is mainly due to the excessive development of fibrinoid deposits, and the underlying diseases are various. The authors have studied the fibrin formation in a group of pulmonary tuberculosis patients. The patients were divided into two groups: group I--patients with low bacterial excretion (38 patients), group II--patients with high bacterial excretion (55 patients). The authors found the fibrin formation on the lung tissue surface in all the examined patients of group I, while in the patients of group II no such alteration was observed. There were analysed the degree of bacterial excretion, the degree of alveolitis as well as the activity of the process. The value of partial root resection in the treatment of failed vertical ramus osteotomy for mandibular prognathism. Failure of vertical ramus osteotomy (VRO) for the correction of mandibular prognathism is sometimes observed. This study evaluated the results of partial root resection (PRR) and the short-term postoperative changes of occlusal condyle-cancellous bone relationship in the treatment of mandibular prognathism with the use of VRO. Twenty-five patients received PRR and VRO (group A) and 25 patients received VRO alone (group B). For all patients, CT scans were obtained before surgery and at the time of scheduled follow-up. The condyle-cancellous bone distances (CBD) on the control and operated sides were compared. At the last visit, 25% of patients in group A reported posterior occlusal movement and 8% reported vertical relapse of the mandible. No patient in group B reported a relapse. The occlusal movement was significantly greater in group A than in group B. There was no significant difference in the CBD before surgery or at follow-up between the two groups. Partial root resection is a reasonable alternative to additional osteotomies when treating patients with VRO who had achieved a satisfactory result with VRO alone.
