Released in Hindi,.In a first for the mission, scientists have discovered a new "superbug" in the largest freshwater fish in the world. The Australian, huge catfish was found to contain a never-before-seen bacterial super-organism, according to a new study in the journal Ecology and Evolution. "This is the first discovery of an entire microbial community in a vertebrate," said Australian professor Dr Elizabeth Day, a co-author of the study. "It's unusual, especially in freshwater fish," said Day, an evolutionary biologist and fish expert at the University of New South Wales in Australia. Catfish in Vietnam had the same super-bacteria The team, which included other scientists from the University of São Paulo in Brazil, first discovered the bacteria in six-foot-long (1.8 meter-long) catfish caught in the Binh Duong province in central Vietnam. The team, who were part of a five-year project led by the Australian Centre for Ecogenomics (ACE), decided to compare the bacteria in the catfish with a similar collection of Australian catfish. Scientists found that the Vietnamese catfish and Australian catfish have the same super-organism, but they only took up about a tenth of the microbial organisms in the fish, Day told AFP. The Canadian catfish has no super-bacteria The international team also sampled a catfish caught in Canada, and the Canadian and Australian catfish had no super-bacteria. Instead, they found a different kind of bacteria in the Canadian catfish. "This is an important finding. This is the largest fish in the world and it should have the largest bacterial community," said Day. - 'Most unlikely event' - "In this study we looked for what are known as the big 16 bacteria and we didn't find them," Day told AFP. "So
